the unfinished world

Material Topography

The pale light of other bodies fills your body,
like salmon eggs rising to the blue crook of your elbow.
The other bodies in my body flush outwards, with the still small wings of songbirds.
What a kind and terrible thing it is to have been led up to, to be pregnant with the past. Do you remember Lahore burning? The camps sprawled like thighs across the city of poets?
Do you remember
trains departing?
The flowing warmth of bodies
transfigured to the smell of bread?
Your migrations beat out from within you, the journeys of your bones and your irises. There have been many ships and many trains, many long walks taken with empty pockets to bring you here.

For the Center of the World

The plain states here throw down their jewels and flats, and fold to coal country’s ridged slopes, as belly curves to sex and neck curves to chin.

Muddy Ohio, dun and dim, segments each span and runs, runs full and freely, from this tug to the yoke of Mississippi where each red run of clay and bright of lime and frag of gypsum will be, once and for all, accounted for.
The Real Lives of Others

Beth enters paroxysms of library-use.

Mackenzie leans her elbows back on the quad next to Richard and Jeff and thinks slowly of nails.

Steadily, Matt and Chris walk in the bow orbit of a gull.

The lake is beautiful, here, in an oxidized way. Beautiful like baby carrots glistening in the bag.

It is outrageous and sometimes overwhelms passers-by.

What Was I When I Could Not Be Your Dog?

A list of equivalences? A list of something?

A squirrel dragging a bagel, a flea market teapot, another blue… another animal:

vague and indecisive, the opposite of a barn cat.

Was I scrawny or calico? Enameled or nude? A folk-punk act called Renegade Sad?

I was probably not that one.

I do not remember what I was.

I do not remember the beauty or the ugliness there, when I could not be your dog.

I only remember the white, fleshy planes departing Midway airport like so many plodding dragonflies.

I only remember the yellow sweep of kitchen light, and a longing, sudden and deep, to be a swimsuit: to be neutral and bright and cleaned in use.

“The dead are together as pure souls.”
- Mei Yao Chen

I

I have been in Japan 34 days when a man jumps onto the tracks of my train. I am on the Tozai line from Nihonbashi towards Nakano. I am closest to him, just across a set of doors. I see a twitching arm pointing up, a narrow run of blood.

I am sorry for my indiscretions. For the people I do not keep in touch with and for the things I wonder if they feel.

I wish to grow roses on the high central plains, to turn inward and rust as lost tankers in the bay.

The dead are together as pure souls. It is enough to be simple and to desire simple things.

II

The dead are together as pure souls.
Out in good winter, carrying that old joy in each other’s open places:
in each other’s eyes and mouths, in the little of their memories where it (that old joy) clicks like brittle kindle.

The dead are together as pure souls.
I think we need new words and new fingers with tight nails to pierce the skin of fat peaches, to slit open the plastic wrap on those chicken hearts. There’s an easy joke here somewhere. I wake up underground and say:

“I’m alive! I can feel again!”

and laying there in the dark, bite my nails.

The dead are together as pure souls
turning over perfect cuticles they rise and look at their gravestones broken down perfectly.

The dead are together as pure souls
smiling their own hands’ webbing to ripe, blessed open.

The dead are together as pure souls shuffling against us, here, against each other’s nothing. Carrying that old joy for us, carrying it on their backs and under their fingernails, in the holes of their cheeks outwards, like water, like winter filling open places.

The dead are together as pure souls
and they don’t mind being porters, we’ve joked about it, about getting them velvet doormen coats, gold-fringed fezzes.

“You know,”

they say

“we never really set us apart. I’ve visited the Artificial Life lab at Todai and know well the thesis that consciousness arises out of complex systems. But you are made of a hundred billion systems, and you make up a hundred billion more, many of which include us!”

so we break and talk about it (with hot chocolate), our particles banging together. Our old joy clacking together, like river rocks drifting downstream.

It came everywhere at once. A plague of wasting. People get tired and die. It doesn’t seem to pick any group in particular: cities, farms, the monied and the poor. Middlemen die on the toilet, in their white button-ups; children keel over on playground sides.

From what anyone can tell, it seems like the slump happens first, followed by a gradual and harmonic decline in functional neural amplitude and, eventually, body function. Before the slump, in most cases, there is a slight smile, a fixed turning-up of the edges of the lips, although scientists are unable to pinpoint a fixed cause. Theories range. It could be the first slowing of the maxillofacial nerves.

People die everywhere now. When my grandfather died, it was in hospice, in a room that smelled like dying. My grandmother kept sleeping there; I slept outside of her door that first, short night, after his heart stopped and his lips changed color and he stopped huffing. She went back to sleep, in the same room. I remember thinking: “How could anyone do it?” I remember the smell of a sputtering body, a wasting one, flowing steadily from their room towards my bed in the hallway and out the window above me. This morning, I saw a man die at マクドナルド, filling his cup of sprite. It was like that small push: the steady weight of cold drink from the nozzle, somehow bent him to its dull will. With the bottom of his cup, he bent over and over, until he was on the floor, and had dropped it, its sticky liquid soaking the back of his shirt.

Other than the smile, specialists have noted that about two weeks before dying a host of small mental phenomena may appear. These include perfect quantization (the ability to visualize quantity accurately, to picture 1,000 as 1,000 and 1,000,000,000 as 1,000,000,000; my favorite story so far about this one is an Investment Banker who couldn’t stop laughing, before, of course, he remembered the Holocaust, and couldn’t stop weeping), increased desire for touch, intense love of children, and an unhurried sense of doom.

Nobody wants to check anything off a bucket-list, to go anywhere or do anything special. They may have felt attentive towards their lives’ work, but they felt no particular stress about finishing it. They might vaguely gesture at the final chapter of their novel, or reveal to their children - You know... I always wanted to be a composer - but it didn’t keep them. The Chairwoman of the UN’s Committee on the Rights of Women and Girls proposed renaming women as Men 2.0. It would be easier, she thought. The dying are nothing if not practical. She was noticed, two weeks later, by the fastidious crew of a noodle-joint, who were used to looking out for customers in her position. They shuffled her off to a backroom, discreetly alerted the municipal morgue. When I graduated, my University’s Dean gently shook his fist and said: “I just think everyone deserves an education, I just think everyone deserves it,” and paused to collect himself. We debated if it was a sign. He held on for four weeks, or, it was just him, and he was first struck two weeks later. I used to mourn my friends when they died. I hold them in my head, roll them over still, but it feels different now. We trundle through the land of the living. We ball up our coats and take the subway in the rain.

In マクドナルド, I went up to him. I thought (it’s stupid): the back of his shirt in a pool of cool, bubbly liquid, it must be nice. It reminded me of playing tennis with my dad, him pouring ice water down my back after a drill: that slow movement from absolute cold to pleasure, the look in his eyes holding a racket and a ball. So I went up to him. His lips pursed and drifted up. His eyes closed, but his head held still. I could see his heartbeat in his pale eyelids. The sprite under my knees warmed on the linoleum. “What is it like?” I asked him.

He said, “I can’t tell you.”
After Tamil Sangam Poetry

The last fruits have hardened and fallen from the slender trees outside my window.
Crows carry their seeds leagues across the flat-land.

Does he think of me in the mountains breathing my ghost into the cold air?

(the girl to her friend upon her lover's departure)

My mind has become a mud-alley strewn with thin and brittle reeds stirred by the cold winds.

(the boy to his father after restless travel)

Ice bloomed in slow cracks.
Even dark birds averted their eyes from her golden freckles.
The trees, freed of their leaves, fashioned marriage-clothes from the snow.

(the old man speaking of his wife's return from her natal place)
Poem After Inscriptions on Miniature Paintings in Jaipur’s Albert Hall Museum

"Ragini Asavari is a tribal girl, who plays with snakes."

No one is loved the way I am loved my dear this night stretches a thin skein across my soft palette and in a rush of bees and vipers ruptures into another tongue:

"The mind advises against falling prey to illusion impelled by youth, beauty, and the senses."

I will curve you to the roof of my mouth.
I will tie you down, my second, lesser lover, the way it was you took me by the wrist and showed me: a fox, a crow, a winter thing spitting—a place for false emeralds where you knotted my hair.

"Kamandki professes her helplessness in the face of the king's decision to marry Malti to his friend, who she compares to the lunar node Rahu about to eclipse Malti's moon."

"Lust says those whose hearts are polluted and whose minds are evil ruined their homes and their environment."

"Knowing that the end is certain, man faces many perils."

"Lover's inconsolable separation being eased by application of sandalwood paste, sprinkling of water and waving of fan."

"When I am a better man, perhaps, we'll walk as brothers."

Flying into Newark

I forget your beauty until I'm above you, watching, across your half-coat of frost, chords of geese - all together - gingerly strike for home.

I would forget as to remember.
To breathe in sharp your flushes and smooth your hills, your peach-fuzz forests to brush are pleasures too vast for the holding.
I can only trail across you and let colder newer morning finger each knot I whisper.

When I am a better man, perhaps, we'll walk as brothers.
I'll wrap this body around yours, easy and loose, while we discuss a great and gracious love of lakes and rivers.
Many others have told this story better than I ever could, so I'll stick to what I know:

It started in spring, two years ago. Homes near graveyards noticed first as winter thawed. Light, uneven thumps from below the ground. Gas companies were called, and then geologists, biologists, paranormalists. After, there was nothing to do but stand around, send for the grave diggers.

As far as I know, there was no “first body.” It happened all over the North Atlantic at once, Nova Scotia to Maryland, in a thousand sleepy towns with as many sloping, shady graveyards. Relatively anonymous gravesites were picked first. In those American towns that lay distant claim to the Revolutionary War, it was often a soldier of the times. If not, a forgotten drunk. Less often, an unmarked patch of grass that exhibited a relatively benign pounding.

I cannot tell you how it felt to shovel out the packed dirt from above a coffin, or to watch. I always imagine it in the cemetery near my home, moss-carpeted and pastoral. A local priest would be there, and the Imam and at least one Pandit, alongside a hunch-backed grave digger and maybe a news crew. The atmosphere would be modest; sun would drown out the gravity of the gravestones, exposing their blacks to grey. Fat fluffly clouds would loom above. The soil would be wet and yielding, as it always is in spring. The holy men would shuffle their feet as the spade struck. After so many days of noise, and the numerous claims by experts that it had to be something, or rather, some things, moving down there. I can imagine only minor surprise when the ground was finally cleared, the coffin opened up, and the corpse, worm-eaten and in rags, adjusted its sockets to the sun attempted, feebly, to climb out of its tomb.

It happened in cities too. In Brooklyn and Boston, in the gray industrial wastes of North Jersey and under empty lots in Annapolis. But I was abroad, and can only picture it at home.

Eventually, overwhelmed by compassion at the dead thing’s stumbling tries, the religious men provided the corpse a ladder and it stumbled up, taking no notice of the people. They stood hushed as it lurched over to an old oak and slowly began to climb. It climbed like a child does, no, like a dog does, scrabbling for purchase. Maybe they gasp when it falls the first time, but by the fourth or fifth, it’s routine; the surprisingly light thump, and the quick (though altogether unthreatening) reapproach. Finally, after what must’ve been a pitifully long time, it accomplished its goal, sat in the mottled sun on a thick branch, leaned back, and smiled a rot-tooth smile.

And so it happened everywhere. It was happening still when I came back. The dead only wanted to be happy. Well, not “the dead,” that term stopped getting used after we realized they were not zombies, they wanted no flesh, nor were they returned for some cosmic judgement. And, of course, it wasn’t everyone. Now, people say “invee”, like invalid. It popped up somewhere online and stuck. Rolls off the tongue.

Organizations were formed for the liberation of invees, the tearing up of graveyards. It goes without saying not every corpse is affected, some may be too deteriorated and some, though fresh, must be altogether uninterested in more (or different) living. However, the invees are harmless and cute, and most were freed in a matter of weeks by concerned citizens.

Some flocked to the beaches, walking straight into the dark Atlantic to laugh big, silent laughs with nibbling fish. Others, to the woods, to talk long walks and sleep under the stars, dotting those low Mid-Atlantic hills that, in the deep smell of earth, of cornhusks and loam, a rain-swollen river spilling through. They come most thickly with the last strokes of August, when wet heat lifts the first fall rot from the swamps all over New Jersey, and the rich smell of decomposition fills the air, stirred gently by the fireflies.

Plain Honey

The world cannot be wrong.

There’s a big fat groundhog by the railroad tracks. There are ducks in the pond.

Already, Hangnail Summer, all easy gravity gathers the world of thin sticks and low buzzes.

Gathers the world and its dry grasses, as the arms of lovers gather each other, towards some morning:

some starting grey that thrushes out as a crown for orange light.

I don’t worry much about my dad anymore, about his stumbling, his desire. I have a Yoko Ono meditation app. It tells me: “Make a list of 100 unrelated things.”

There are traps some people set, hoping to lure loved ones back. Elaborate guesses at their purpose. A widow here built a whole fake beach with a wave pool and palm trees for her husband, a swimmer. My mother will sometimes leave out a few particularly plump summer peaches, the kind that melt to sweet nothing on the tongue. They never fall for it. They’re happy out there. By morning, the peaches are gone, the squirrels fat and happy.

Religious don’t know what to make of it. I don’t know if they should. People talk about church membership plummeting. I’ve heard of pastors saying the simplicity of the invees means it is not reanimation at all, not the dead rising, but rather, other souls (of animals? children?) taking their bodies. If there is a successful cult based on this theory, on anything to do with the invees, I haven’t seen it. They seem too simple, too single-minded and soft-hearted, to be implicated in any grand, metaphysical view.

The government is still passing laws for the protection of invees. That as long as they don’t hurt anyone (which none have done yet) or destroy any property, they should be allowed to go about their business. The legislation is largely based on protections already enacted for endangered animals. The public supports it. A few kids, playing pranks on invees for Instagram views, have already been generally scorned, petitions for their arrest have been circulated, etc.

I saw my dad the other day. I was out for a week in Maine, driving along the coast to a new client, and there he was, stumbling alongside the road. I slowed down and drove next to him for a while. He never looked over; one of the first disappointments of the invees’ rise was that they never so much as look straight at the living. After a few minutes, he veered into a blueberry patch. I drove on, thinking of sallow, pock-marked cheeks, surprisingly deft fingers, and bright orange light.
Forty-One Views of the Fight Between General Grievous and Obi-Wan Kenobi in Star Wars Episode III: Revenge of the Sith

The eros of tan light-touched bodies and bodies. Roger Roger. Oh!

All brown and beige, my liege, the Christ-like redeemer of two desert names.

Long hair was so in. Were you a sex object, Ben? I don’t remember.

General Grievous, your satellite ears pan out: roses in morning.

The nimble jump back, Ben, the saber flaring live. You look so young here.

Grievous, of four arms and four stolen things, like some strange Kabbalah text.

Hanging, your hair sways idly in the breeze. Do you breathe here? Do you fall?

The white-silver strokes, the bulging green organ sack. The light, falling West.

My girlfriend's bike, crushed by an icicle. And you, Obi, steely eyed.

Supremacy dawns. We will all be lizards. And maybe robots too.

When you burst his guts you win another right, Ben: To fear, to suffer.

I am all guts. No stomach, no liver, no eyes, no lips, no gums. None.

Chicago, you fuck er, you dipshit city. I’m sorry, I’m sorry.

Dancer-thing, thing-of-bugs-and-beetles-and-metal. For sixteen years, dance.

I had the lego of you and the mount. I spent days stroking its mane.

The love in it all! The cough, a spare change sputter. That big stupid wheel.

I remember the projector screen, my dad. I think he liked this one.

Did he? I can’t place it. The love in the air, in the bright antennae.

You two quarrelers! Kiss and make up. No more this मू तू तू ता!

And Ben, back-flipping callously. Your son will leave. He will kill for love.

Independence! The Invisible Hand, flagship of the cruel general.

I watch this muted in class sometimes. I don’t know why I think of you.

General Grievous! You never thought: “My name, it’s perfect for haiku.”

Wrath smells of pennies, and bodies and spilt fluids. It drifts on the wind.

Do you dream in broad daylight of your dead wife, Ben? Of his flowing hair?

Thorny and horny and ornery and boring are we, General.

You and I, Ben, may practice forgetting. May cowl our heads from the sun.

The world is a room with another room through it. And a droid, somewhere.

Where are we that there is no sweat on your brow? No stain on your nice coat?

Are we mirrors to shine torchlight on? Or just hard, cold bodies in wait?

I stumble, and must look up the actor. Fitting: Ewan McGregor.

Poetically, with beauty, your skull bursts out in flames from the eyes.

Is it still good? Was it ever good? It’s joyous. It’s a loving thing.

Do you need joy, Ben Kenobi? Do you need sex? Do you drink coffee?

Does it matter? At the end, we clatter and fall and shake into bits, cellophane-thin; like the last colonization of the body, by light.

Thank you to the Smart Museum and to the Feitler Center for Academic Inquiry for supporting this project. Without the support of the Smart Scholars program, this work would not have been possible, and I am deeply grateful to have been a part of it.

Thank you Berit Ness, Aaron Wilder, and Gail Gomez for your continued academic and intellectual support. Thank you, as well, to all the scholars who provided assistance with my research, especially Prof. Tyler Williams. Thank you, lastly, to the University of Chicago.

Process

This chapbook was created in response to research into the provenance of two Indian miniature paintings: the first, in the Smart Museum’s collection, the second, passed down through my family. While differentiated by region, subject, and material, the works themselves were unified by the lack of information available about them. The work in the Smart, presented on the left below, had no information associated with it in the museum’s online catalog, and limited details available in the object’s physical file. The work in my family, on the right, had even less information surrounding it: we only knew it likely depicted an ancestor, and was older than my grandmother.

Through consulting scholars of South Asian art history, I was able to trace the Smart’s miniature painting to early 1800s, pre-Vaishnavite Rajasthan, and discovered it likely depicts a courtly figure of some renown. While it is likely to have originated in Jaipur, I was unable to confirm or deny this via archival research. The painting in my family has a similarly murky origin: it matches my family’s origin, as from the Kangra district of Himachal Pradesh, and fits in neatly with the accompanying style of Pahari miniature paintings. The subject is marked by the artist (who we can tell is illiterate, by their mock-Urdu) as a scribe at work, in service of some unknown customer. Additionally, further inquiry into the object reveals something fairly unique among miniature paintings: a landscape-sketch on the back of the portrait itself.

When I set out on this project, I knew I would have to gain comfort with a lack of information, with stringing together what loose facts were available about these pieces, out in the world, into a satisfying object. This is the essential nature of diaspora: it makes us tug ourselves together, build ourselves piece-by-piece from the old and the new, from absence and from presence alike. I could not have predicted the messy year over which this project would come into being but creating this chapbook has helped serve as a kind of anchor, a way of constructing stability and meaning in a time without much. This chapbook served as a locus for revisiting and retooling earlier work with a focus on finding meaning in distance and trajectory, an opportunity to layer the past with light.
