ABSTRACT

Optimizing the batter-pitcher matchup is one of modern baseball’s focuses. Instead of having a fixed lineup throughout the season, teams change their lineups on a daily basis to have a better matchup. However, current statistics like batting average or slugging percentage provide little insight into this goal due to the lack of past head-to-head records. In this paper, an algorithm that utilizes representation learning is proposed to tackle this problem.